Metastatic disease, also known as metastasis, is the spread of cancer from an initial tumor to other parts of the body. Although a cancer cell must first break free from its primary site before it can spread to other areas of the body, it is often the spread, rather than the initial tumor itself, that causes death in many cancer patients. Cancer cells can spread to other parts of the body through the lymphatic system or through the blood stream.

The ability of cancer cells to enter the lymphatic system or the blood stream is referred to as cancer invasiveness.

One of the first steps in cancer invasiveness involves the destruction of the basement membrane that encases the primary tumor. Metastatic cancer cells then migrate through the extracellular matrix and actively destroy surrounding tissue are entered the primary site of invasion. Works on the ability of cancer to infiltrate an organ or part of the body remote from the primary site. In some cases, works on the ability of cancer to infiltrate an organ or part of the body remote from the primary site that works on the ability of cancer to infiltrate an organ or part of the body remote from the primary site.
